The buildings are situated so that the entire farm can be seen therefrom. The farm is supplied with excellent spring water. The reason that the owner wishes to dispose of the above place is on account of poor health. Will make a great sacrifice in order to dispose of the same.

Quick Transition

(Original.)

On a railroad between New York and Albany there is a tunnel which forms a link between two contrasting kinds of scenery. Going northward the traveler passes through flat, uninteresting country shut in by hills; then he darts into a tunnel. When he emerges a panorama of the Hudson river bursts suddenly upon his view. There before him is the Tappan Zee, the broadest part of the river, teeming with all manner of craft, from a tiny skiff to an immense steamer, while beyond and about tower the highlands.

"Delightful!" said a gentleman sitting opposite me the first time I witnessed this transformation scene.

"Entrancing!" I replied. "I have noticed your expression," he added sympathetically, "because the tunnel is of especial interest to me. In it came for me a transformation as marked as that between its south and north ends."

I begged for the story, and he gave it to me.

"From our first meeting it was apparent to both of us that Della Pennington and I were made for each other. She was the daughter of an aristocratic New Yorker, and I was a young army officer without fortune. When I asked her father for her hand I was not surprised to meet with a flat refusal. Della was not one of those willow twigs to be bent at the option of the holder. She had inherited an independence of character, and did not propose that our lives should be wrecked by any one. She informed her father that she intended to marry me with or without his consent, whereupon he directed her to prepare for a trip to Europe.

"Della was too young to openly refuse to obey, and it was evident that our affair must be managed clandestinely. I was stationed at the time at one of the forts in New York harbor, but was ordered to report for duty on a certain date at West Point. Before leaving I was astonished at receiving word from Della that she had concluded to obey her father and go to Europe, to be gone three years. Time would show whether we were so attached that we would be of the same mind on her return. For herself her heart would continue as it was, but the pressure upon her was so strong that she feared a marriage of convenience would be her inevitable fate.

"I replied to her note both coldly and despondently. 'I go to my new post tomorrow,' I wrote in conclusion, 'while I believe you sail in a day or two for Europe. I consider this note a last farewell.'

"The evening before my intended departure I received a note from Della, brought openly by one of her father's servants, saying that she would like to send me a souvenir by which to remember her. It had not yet been sent home, but if I would inform her by what train I intended going she would send it to the station. I gave the train time verbally to the servant. Taking her action to be submission to her father's will, I had neither the heart nor the complacency to write another farewell.

"In the morning at the station the same servant appeared and handed me a box containing a little gold heirloom. It gave me no satisfaction. Indeed, if she had told me that she did not love me I think I would have been more easily overcome by my disappointment. I boarded the train, which pulled out of the station, and I began a journey over the stretch of country we have just passed. It is needless to say that my meditations were no more pleasing than the scenery. I sat with folded arms and head down, only occasionally glancing out of the window. As for my fellow passengers, they did not in the least interest me. Finally the low hills on either side shut us in closer and closer, and I began to think that we must soon run either over or under them. Then suddenly we struck the tunnel.

"The few moments we were passing through it were the most gloomy I have ever known. I disliked tunnels and never entered one without experiencing something of their somberness. In that dark passage it seemed to me as concentrated all the sadness of a life-disappointment, the consciousness that I had been wrecked, blighted, blighted, left to live without that which would have made life worth living.

"Then there came a few seconds of dawning light, and this beautiful view spring into existence. For the moment my attention was drawn from my bereavement and concentrated upon the scene. But another matter immediately drew it aside. When we entered the tunnel I had sat alone; now some one was sitting beside me. I turned and looked into the face of—

"Della?"

"How did you divine it?"

"No other transition could have compared with entering and leaving the tunnel. But go on, explain."

"Della to disarm all suspicion showed her father her letters to me. The asking for my train was also a ruse to know when I would go. Disguised as an old woman she had gone to the station, entered the same car as I and ridden behind me, waiting an opportunity to address me without attracting attention. When we entered the tunnel it occurred to her to take advantage of the darkness to make herself known to me, and the temptation to throw off her disguise was too strong to be resisted."

"And the passengers?"

"I saw several of them looking at us suspiciously, but one by one they seemed to make up their minds that they had been mistaken. In a short time we were at West Point and before I reported at headquarters had visited the chaplain, and Della and I were made one."
